

Bench - Kings Lynn 2009

This example of High Victorian bench design was produced for the restoration project at The Walks in Kings Lynn. The design features stylized acanthus leaves plus some architectural features within a framework that owes inspiration to the influential design work of both Christopher Dresser and possibly Thomas Jeckyl. The design also incorporates two silhouette faces, although extensive research has failed to identify them, it is assumed they were benefactors of the initial project at some stage. Should these designs be of interest to you, it is possible to replace the original portraiture with either figures or alternative designs.

In the initial stages of the restoration, Lost Art were working exclusively from original illustrations until eventually an original was found in a garden adjacent to the site. In addition to the traditional cast iron and timber benches, Lost Art also designed and produced a number of longer, curved benches that also used the bench ends. This serves to illustrate our adaptability and capability and the range of our services.
